Fully Insured versus Self-Funded Health Plans

Fully insured and self-funded health plans differ in how employers pay for coverage, manage financial risk, and control healthcare spending. Fully insured plans emphasize predictable premiums and carrier-managed risk, while self-funded plans offer greater flexibility, claims visibility, and potential savings in exchange for assuming claims risk and variable costs.

Comparison Topic	Fully Insured	Self-Funded
Funding	Employer pays a fixed monthly premium while the carrier takes on all the claims risk.	Employer pays medical and pharmacy claims as they occur, administration of the plan and reinsurance are fixed costs.
Financial risk	Carrier assumes claims risk.	Employer assumes claims risk, typically with stop-loss protection.
Potential savings	Carrier generally retains favorable claims experience.	Employer retains the benefit when claims are lower than expected.
Claims transparency	Generally limited access to detailed claims data.	Greater visibility into utilization, high-cost claims, and pharmacy spending.
Plan flexibility	Design and administration are generally tied to carrier offerings.	More options to customize benefits, networks, vendors, and cost controls.
Stop-loss protection	Not purchased separately; carrier bears claims risk.	Specific and aggregate coverage can protect against large individual claims and high total claims.
Cash flow	Premiums are paid regardless of claims experience.	Employer retains funds until claims are paid.
Taxes and expenses	Premiums include carrier expenses, risk charges, profit, and applicable premium taxes.	Some premium-related costs may be reduced; administration, stop-loss, and other expenses remain.
Long-term strategy	Simplicity and predictability, with less control over healthcare spending.	More active cost management through PBM carve-outs, specialty pharmacy management, network optimization, and targeted claims management.
